The Journey to Diagnosis #AskAboutFTD

It's the most common dementia for those under age 60. But today, few people know about this underdiagnosed disease and its devastating impact.

People and families with questions about unexplained changes in behavior or communication need to know about FTD. Families who face this disease - also referred to as frontotemporal degeneration or frontotemporal dementia— deserve to have good options for treatments and support.

For World FTD Awareness Week 2022, World FTD United has created a series of short videos highlighting challenges that families face on the journey to diagnosis. Beginning on September 25, we will release a series of videos, and urge families to share their own FTD diagnosis stories.

By getting the word out about FTD, we can get more families and health professionals asking the questions that can increase FTD diagnosis. In doing so, we can get families connected to the support options they need, and get them information about emerging experimental treatments.

Stay tuned for more - and get ready to share your own diagnosis story.
You can bring help, support, and understanding to families around the globe.
